STATEMENT OF CULTURAL HERITAGE VALUE AND DESCRIPTION OF HERITAGE ATTRIBUTES

Statement of Cultural Heritage Value

The 1888-89 brick row-building located at 209-211 James Street South possesses cultural heritage value due to its association with the Victorian land-development process of subdivision and speculative building in the City of Hamilton. In the capitalist urban society of the late-nineteenth century, the construction of buildings by speculative developers became increasingly common. Andrew Rutherford, an established Hamilton businessman, had the three, attached, two-storey residences built by contractor James Philips. In its composition, design and materials, the building is a representative example of High Victorian residential architecture and retains its original architectural configuration of a two-storey building with hipped roof, bays and gables. Soon after construction, the building was converted into a multiple unit dwelling and has also evolved to include commercial uses. Located in an area that contains a number of surviving nineteenth century buildings, 209-211 James Street South serves as a reminder of the James Street South Victorian streetscape, bordering the neighbourhoods of Corktown on the east and Durand on the west.

Description of Heritage Attributes

The north, west and south elevations of the main building mass and the north and south elevations of the rear extension along with the hipped roofs with dormers and gables; together with all original construction materials and all component architectural features and detailing.
